GOOD HOESSES. 13 Once a company is organized to buy a horse the best horseman of the group should be delegated to make the purchase and unless he is thoroughly competent he should enlist the services of some disinterested party who knows a good stallion and knows the market value of stallions. It is the common belief of many farmers that a stallion has no fixed market value, but a buying trip out with an experienced and successful dealer will show one that the stud horse has just about as well fixed a value as the work horse or the beef steer when put upon the market. In going about the purchase of a stallion one should take plenty of time and begin looking some weeks ahead of the time when the horse will be needed. A change of locality affects the welfare of a horse...
