The preliminary examination made it apparent that the group comprises a swarm of clearly separable species, many of which had not been recognized by the taxonomists and which gave basis for the current opinion as to the wide variability of the common evening-primrose (O. biennis). The study of genetic relationships and of the phenomena of hybridization in general has necessitated the organization of extensive cultures, which will need continuance for two or more seasons before definite results may be announced, and their discussion is reserved for a future paper. A few cases of fixed hybrids have been encountered, however, in which the crossing of two species resulted in the production of a progeny consisting of one fixed type constant in successive generations. Forms arising in this way are, in reality, new species, and doubtless many such have arisen naturally and now constitute a part of the native flora. Striking cases of vegetative mutation, or bud-sports, having arisen, attention has been devoted to a study of the inheritance of the saltatory groups of characters. A systematic attempt to localize mutatory changes in the life-cycle of the sporophyte has been made, and has met with marked success in a preliminary way, since it has been possible to induce new mutants by the use of solutions of strong osmotic activity and by highly dilute preparations of mineral salts, some of which are poisonous to plants in high...
