Inasmuch as centralizers handled more than 95 per cent of the butterfat of the state and came constantly in competition with these small business concerns, the price paid to farmers was undoubtedly as high as they could afford. The actual price paid to farmers by the locals, however, was only 25.7293 cents a pound for butter fat as compared to a price of 27.4438 paid by centralizers to the farmers who delivered cream at their doors. Farmers delivering cream to centralizers obtained 1.7145 cents higher price than did those delivering to local creameries. A very small proportion of Kansas butterfat, however, was delivered directly by farmers either to local or centralizer concerns. Since the local creameries received all of their fat on the one basis of a delivered price, while the centralizers secured butterfat...
