Excerpt: . . . mothers and fathers will impel them to adopt similar aims and ways in their own homes. The Cleveland school authorities already realize the importance of their home-influencing activities at the Eagle school. They are conscious too of the need of similar undertakings in other schools. As time goes by they will undoubtedly devote more and more energy to the elaboration of city-wide machinery for bringing parents into immediate touch with the school system and that machine will be a part of the larger development we are foretelling. The School And The Street Making a book-shelf in a school shop demonstrates one of the fundamental things of moral life--that personal toil normally precedes the possession of a valuable commodity. The boy who passes from the manual-training room into a back-alley crap game, where chance, not skill, confers wealth, is confronted with a challenging contradiction of the law which the school has just been trying to write into his being. The lesson of the street is often not only more thrilling but plainer than the lesson of the classroom. No school system that is sincere in its desire to make its deposits stick in the pupils marrow can overlook the plucking devices which await him outside the classroom door. The sinister influences of the street operate upon boys and girls on the way to and from school and after the evening meal, and they are to be found in residential sections as well as in tenement-house districts....
