Brand New Book ***** Print on Demand *****.Excerpt from Courses Toward Urban Life: Archeological Considerations of Some Cultural Alternates Because of the foregoing circumstances, what we achieved was in no sense a universal and world-wide consideration of the subject matter of our concern. We believe, however, that it was our very good fortune to have had such particular participants and area coverage as we did have. As it was originally announced, the subject matter of the symposium was proposed to be as follows: From 15,000 B. C. To The Thresholds Of Urban Civilizations: A World-Wide Consideration Of The Cultural Alternatives The symposium is to be concerned with tracing man's history from latest Pleistocene times up to the threshold of the urban civilizations. It is projected on a world-wide basis. It will deal, substantively, with those archeological evidences that reveal the varying degrees of intensification of food-collecting, the transitions from food-collecting to partial or to fully effective food production, and the eventual emergence of city life and civilization. The cultural consequences and accompaniments of these transitions are to be examined closely. Inquiry will be directed not only to those regions where urbanization was first to crystallize but to those more peripheral regions that may or may not have attained full urbanism. Attention will be given to environmental adaptations under differing conditions and to shifts in adaptations either before or following the appearance of food production. The relative roles of environmental factors and migration and/or diffusion in the conversion of hunter-collector cultures to those of food production will also be studied. Interest will center upon those qualities and quantities of cultural intensifications immediately antecedent to the appearance of urban civilizations, analyzing the evidences for such...
